That doesn't mean you don't follow the news or that you aren't more informed than you were on election day. But there's a good chance you don't have the same full picture of what's going on in the world as your neighbors. According to a new poll conducted by the Pew Research Center, a nonprofit that tracks public opinion, just a quarter of Americans are aware of the fake news that has been spread during the 2016 presidential election. That's a drop from the 2016 presidential election, when more than half of Americans were aware of fake news. However, about half of Americans say they were aware of the fake news that was spread during the campaign – so it's fair to assume that it's become more widespread than the issue was during the campaign. As the country continues to grapple with a fractured media landscape, it's important to understand the prevalence of fake news. In fact, knowing how often you've come across fake information is the first step to identifying the most common fake news. But first, what is fake news? In this post, we'll look at the popular definition of fake news and why it's important to understand what it really means. We'll also look at what other research has found about fake news, its origins and how the media uses fake news in its reporting. "Fake news" Defined The term "fake news" typically refers to items that are labeled as such but are published by a publication with some sort of agenda or particular bias. But in the context of the 2016 presidential campaign, the term has come to represent any news published by any media outlet that is perceived to be slanted in favor of one candidate. To more accurately define "fake news," we'll need to look at the broader definition of propaganda 82157476af
